Produce highquality photos and documents with lowpriced ink cartridges, and scan and copy with ease. The first question one needs to ask themselves when investing in such tech we tend to keep printers for more than just a couple years is what you're going to need it for. Is it just printing out papers to hand in. Or will you need it for scanning, for copying and maybe faxing too. A great number of printers come with all these functions builtin, but others are more barebones, so it's an important question to ask yourself. Secondly, you want to think about connectivity. Most printers now come with builtin WiFi or Bluetooth as a feature, but not all of them do. You don't want to end up in a situation where you were depending on your printer to be able to print from your smartphone, and then find out you're missing a connection. This is really key. If you're a student heading off to college even if you're not leaving the house, you may want something on the smaller side, as a dorm room won't accommodate anything much larger than the smaller sizes. This goes hand in hand with the volume you'll need to print. If you're handing in the occasional paper, you might need only the lowestend, most compact device. But if you expect a heavier print load and will be producing reams of work every week, you might want to consider something more equipped for an office. Important If you're on the heavierduty side, keep an eye on how much toner and ink replacements will cost you. This adds up! Inkjet versus laser. Color tends to be more expensive and demanding, but it can also be necessary if your work requires it, or you're looking to print images.

In terms of inkjet versus laser, think of it in terms of history, in that inkjet printers use ink laser printers use toner, which will not last as long. It fades. That said, ink tends to be better for photos and documents with color. If you just want a printer for photos say of friends, but perhaps for presentations, too, there are printers dedicated just to that function. Don't bite off more than you need to unnecessarily.
